ENGLISH CAST STONE GARDEN RABBIT SCULPTURE WITH WEATHERED PATINA, CIRCA 1920

$1,800

An early 20th-century English cast stone garden rabbit, dating to circa 1920, modeled in an upright and attentive pose with raised forepaws and elongated ears. The figure has a strong vertical presence, standing just under 30 inches high, giving it architectural weight while retaining the gentle charm associated with traditional English garden ornament.

The sculptural modeling is naturalistic yet slightly stylized, with softly defined musculature and a calm, alert expression. The surface displays an authentic, time-earned patina with natural lichen staining and mineral deposits, particularly visible along the ears and upper contours. This organic weathering gives the piece depth, tonal variation, and texture that cannot be replicated artificially. The granular composition of the cast stone and subtle surface pitting are fully consistent with early 20th-century garden statuary.

Its scale makes it highly versatile: substantial enough to anchor a planting bed or terrace edge, yet intimate enough to sit near a doorway, along a gravel path, or within clipped hedging. The restrained modeling keeps it from feeling overly decorative or whimsical, allowing it to integrate seamlessly into traditional English landscapes as well as more curated, design-driven outdoor settings.

A strong and characterful example of period English garden sculpture.
